

A Machine That Vanishes

At dinner, an inventor showed his friends a tiny machine. He said it could travel through time. When a lever moved, the little machine vanished! His guests were amazed, but some thought it was a trick. In his workshop stood a larger machine, big enough to carry a person.

Far Into the Future

The inventor sat in the larger machine and moved its lever. Day and night flashed past. Buildings changed, and whole seasons seemed to flicker in moments. He stopped in the year 802,701. His workshop was gone. He had arrived in a strange garden beside a huge white statue.

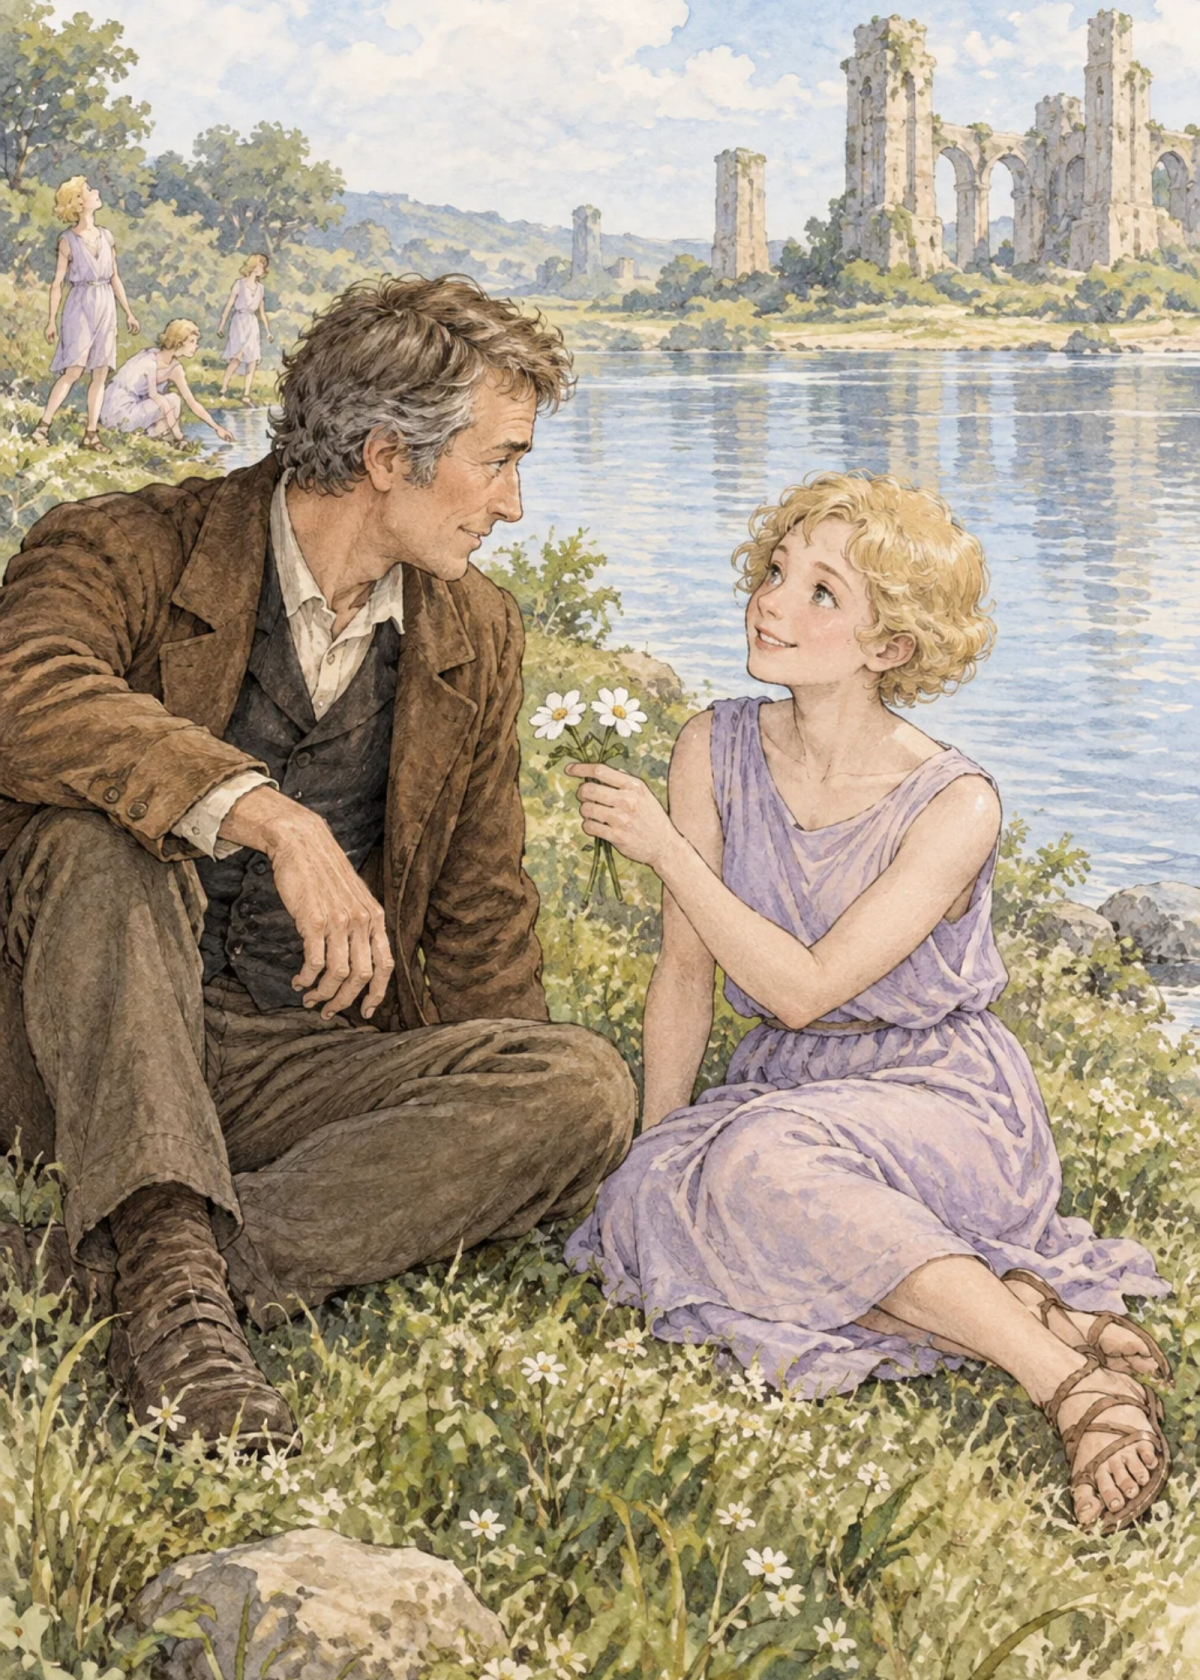

A Beautiful World, a Missing Machine

Small, gentle people called the Eloi welcomed him with flowers and fruit. Their world seemed peaceful. But when he returned to the garden, his machine had disappeared. Without it, he could never get home. Marks in the grass led toward the white statue, whose base had locked metal doors.

A Friend Named Weena

One day he saw an Eloi named Weena struggling in the river. He saved her, while the others did little to help. After that, Weena stayed close to him and gave him flowers. She was frightened of the dark. Her fear suggested that this lovely world was hiding something.

The People Underground

Beneath the ground lived pale people called Morlocks. They worked among old machines and could see in the dark. The Traveller guessed that a deep divide between rich and poor had changed humanity over thousands of years. Now the Eloi lived above, while the Morlocks hunted them at night.

The Old Museum

The Traveller and Weena walked to a great ruined building. It had once been a museum. He hoped to find tools that could help him open the statue's doors and recover his machine. Among the dusty displays, he found matches and other useful supplies. They had stayed too long: night was coming.

Lost in the Fire

They tried to cross the woods in darkness. Morlocks followed them, and the Traveller used fire to keep them back. But the flames spread through the trees. In the fear and confusion, he lost Weena. He searched and called for her, but she was gone. He believed she had died.

The Trap at the Statue

The metal doors beneath the white statue were open. Inside waited his machine. The Morlocks had set a trap! The doors shut behind him, and the room went dark. He reached the seat, fitted the control levers and escaped through time. Once more, the world rushed past him.

The Far End of Time

He travelled much farther into the future. The sun looked huge and red above a cold, silent shore. Strange creatures moved beside the sea, and the air was hard to breathe. At last, almost all life seemed gone.

Frightened by this lonely future, he turned the machine toward home.

Back at the Dinner Table

He returned to his own time, tired, hungry and shaken. His friends listened as he told them what had happened. Some doubted his story. Then he showed them the two strange white flowers Weena had given him. They were small reminders of kindness in a world so far away.

One More Journey

The next day, his friend came back to the workshop. The Traveller was preparing to leave again, this time with a camera and a bag. He promised to return soon. Then the machine flashed, blurred and vanished. His friend waited, hoping to hear another extraordinary story.

Two Flowers Remain

Three years passed, and the Traveller still had not returned. His friend wondered where—and when—he might be. The future remained a mystery. But he kept Weena's two flowers. Though they had dried and faded, they reminded him that kindness could survive even in a very different world.

